

The FCC should not do anything that would weaken Indiana's (or any other state's) telephone privacy laws. It's nice to know that I can come home and have a quiet evening after work. If the law was weakened this would not be the case. The law has drastically reduced the number and frequency of unsolicited sales calls I have received on my home phone. I have had virtually NO calls since being added to the list and that's the way I want it and that's the way it should be. If the laws are weakened to allow companies to call "existing customers" it would only be a matter of time before everyone with a phone line would be an "existing customer". I don't want any sales calls to ever be made to my phone number. If I want to buy something, I go to the store to get it. The calls I used to get were a complete waste of my time and the solicitors efforts. For these reasons, the FCC should leave our very effective law alone.
